GO TO JAIL*Lindsay Sent Eight
Koreans To
Reef.*They Had Nearly Killed
A. W. Taylor, a
Collector.*They Had Bound Him and Tried To Stone Him To Death.

There were eight of them; eight fierce looking Koreans, said to be Fusan men, or men from one of the southern cities of Korea and they were bad characters. With about forty other Koreans they had held a little "court" down at Ewa and decided that A. W. Taylor, a local collector for a Korean bank, must die—and die too according to the traditions of some of the lower classes of Korea, by being bound hand and foot and stoned to death. Taylor had been bound, wounded in a dozen places, and was just about to be taken out and stoned to death when a plantation policeman rescued him. This policeman told the Koreans that he would arrest Taylor and that their troubles would be ended in this way. So the Koreans permitted Taylor to go. He was taken on a plantation train to the hospital and was barely able to struggle into Judge Lindsay's court yesterday afternoon and tell the story of his struggles with the mob. On the testimony given in the police court Judge Lindsay sentenced eight Koreans to hard labor for a period of three months each. One Korean he permitted to go for it was stated that this man had brought water to wash the blood from Taylor's wounds after he had been rescued.

With nine tough looking characters, some of them dressed in the loose, dirty, flowing garments of the Korean farm hand staring into his face Taylor told his story. He said that he was the agent of a Korean bank which had advanced each of these men money for clothing and other articles which they needed in coming to Hawaii. The men were coming here to secure work as farmers on plantations and they signed notes agreeing to pay back the money to the firm's agent in Honolulu. Last Saturday evening Taylor, an assistant named J. D. Julian, and a Korean interpreter went to Ewa to make the collections from the men in the camp there. Taylor is a fluent Korean speaker and so really did not need an interpreter. He carried with him a satchel in which were the notes made by the Koreans, before they left home, acknowledging the debt.

Taylor arrived at the camp in the evening. He immediately interviewed several of the Koreans and asked them to settle. They declared they had no money. Taylor asked them to give him orders on the plantation for the amount of their debt. A few of them agreed to do this and as Taylor thought the scheme would be agreeable to all of the men he endeavored to get them into one large room to talk to them. Then trouble followed. The rough element among the laborers thought it would be a good thing to kill Taylor and then taking the satchel containing the notes and the orders on the plantation, they had already signed, destroy them and thus wipe out all evidence of debt. They had some surly talk with Taylor. One thing led to another until the whole mob of fifty men jumped for him. A rough and tumble fight followed. Laborers struck Taylor with wooden shoes, sticks of cordwood, rope ends, pots, kettles, and in fact anything they could lay their hands on. He put up a brave fight but was soon floored, bleeding from head to foot. His Korean assistant ran away and Julian, like Taylor, was being attacked by the mob. Taylor became insensible and while lying on the floor was jumped on, trod under foot, and struck in the face. At the same time a portion of the crowd agreed that Taylor should be killed. Another portion of the men thought he should not be killed and during this factional quarrel Taylor regained consciousness. He struggled to his feet with an idea of getting into a room and standing in a corner so that the Koreans could only reach him from one direction. He accomplished this but was again overpowered and borne to the floor. During all of this time he talked to the Koreans. He appealed to them to release him and stated that no trouble would follow. About this time the plantation policeman appeared on the scene and rescued him. In another half hour, had the policeman not arrived, Taylor would have been dead.

In court the men made many novel statements concerning the affair. One man said: "We know that according to the law of this country it is wrong to strike a man. But Mr. Taylor strike first. Then we bind him up. He speak our language, why does he not speak with his mouth instead of with his hands?" Each had a rambling yarn to tell. This occupied considerable time and Judge Lindsay patiently heard them through. At the close of the taking of evidence he said that there seemed to be some doubt as to whether one man was guilty of what might be termed attempted murder or of a great act of kindness toward a wounded man and allowing this man the benefit of the doubt he discharged him.

To the other eight men Lindsay, through two interpreters, gave some sound advice. He said that each had declared that Taylor had committed the assault but that even if this were true the men had no right to take the law into their own hands and punish Taylor. They had beaten him almost to death. Even now, several days later, he was covered with scars and bruises and was hardly able to walk. Would they make him believe that Taylor had inflicted these scars on his own person? Taylor knew who he was dealing with and would have been unlikely, alone, to have started a fight among so many persons as were gathered in that camp at Ewa for he would have certainly known what the result would be as soon as the crowd became angered. The Judge believed that the men had been guilty of assault and battery as charged but thought that the prosecution could have made the stronger charge of attempted murder. Each of the men in court had been identified as assailants of Taylor. Many men who could not be identified had escaped trial but these men had been identified and he would find them guilty. He did not wish to be too lenient with them nor did he wish to be harsh to new arrivals in the country but he would sentence them to three months' imprisonment each at hard labor and hoped that this would be a warning to other Koreans that the laws of the country must be respected and that if they thought themselves injured they should visit the proper authorities and make their complaints instead of attempting to carry out their own revenge in a blood thirsty manner.

The prisoners had no lawyer but were given every opportunity to refute the evidence of the complaining witnesses. These men are said to be the toughest of the Koreans and those left in camp at Ewa can be easily handled by their foremen.

Cleanly woman has an erroneous idea that by scouring the scalp, which removes the dandruff scales, she is curing the dandruff. She may wash her scalp every day, and yet have dandruff her life long, accompanied by falling hair, too. The only way in the world to cure dandruff is to kill the dandruff germ, and there is no hair preparation that will do that but Newbro's Herpicide. Herpicide by killing the dandruff germ, leaves the hair free to grow as healthy Nature intended. Destroy the cause you remove the effect. Kill the dandruff germ with Herpicide.
